Different Parents, Different Parenting Styles:

Decision-making styles vary greatly from one family to another. Most parenting styles fit one of three basic models: the authoritarian style, the permissive style, or the democratic style.

In the authoritarian style, parents present themselves as the absolute authority in all matters. Children do not argue with their parents' decisions. Authoritarian parents believe that teaching their children respect for authority will instill strong moral character in them. Children are not encouraged to voice their own opinions or desires on matters.

In the permissive style, parents take a largely "hands-off" approach to parenthood. Rules concerning homework, bedtimes, TV schedules, diet, etc., are not set by parents. Children and adolescents are free to make these decisions for themselves. Statistically, children raised in the permissive style achieve lower grades in school and are more likely to engage in high-risk behaviors.

The democratic style of
