The Idea of "Not Yet"

It's important that we acknowledge all the hard work that students (and families) have been doing since the beginning of the school year. Things are different, and the students have been flexible as they have done what has been asked. Make sure you talk with your student(s) about their progress and all that they have accomplished already this quarter.

Focusing on strengths can be encouraging and motivating for students as they navigate new things and learn new material. The idea of, "not yet," refers to the fact that someone may not be able to do something yet, but it can be learned. Sometimes learning takes time. This focus can be helpful for everyone, and reminds us that learning new things doesn't happen automatically.
