New Milford's Mission Statement

The mission of the New Milford Public Schools, a collaborative partnership of students, educators, family and community, is to prepare each and every student to compete and excel in an ever-changing world, embrace challenges with vigor, respect and appreciate the worth of every human being, and contribute to society by providing effective instruction and dynamic curriculum, offering a wide range of valuable experiences, and inspiring students to pursue their dreams and aspirations.

Writing and Research Workshop Overview-

This writing course introduces students to discourse, research, and research writing for the purpose of proposing solutions to problems. Rather than learning about these subjects in the abstract, students will learn by engaging in both global, national and local problems and issues. To achieve this, students will learn how to:

- Develop an actionable central research question
- Propose a research project
- Conduct primary and secondary research
- Design an action-oriented research project for publication

This course will interest individuals who want to learn more about how to create change in the world through research and writing. This class will also interest those who want to learn how to compose in a digital environment. Students will directly learn about the power and pleasures of writing.

By engaging with local, national and global questions and problems, students will have the opportunity to enter into important discussions and possibly create meaningful changes in the lives of those around them. Proposing solutions to local, national, and global problems requires grounding research in the local context and communicating clear solutions and calls for action that are understandable and relevant to the intended audience(s). Students will learn how to conduct research, write about a particular issue, and construct a call to action based upon their research. Students will create a digital portfolio that enables them to publish and share their research and writing and demonstrate what they have learned. Specifically, they will provide evidence that they have acquired the skills and knowledge taught during the course.

Features of Writing and Research Workshop-

Rhetorical Knowledge

Students in Writing and Research Workshop will engage with research-based writing as an active, rhetorical process. Sometimes this approach means that students will be encouraged to develop their own lines of inquiry entirely, working from them to discover various kinds of evidence and perspectives. At other times, students will be challenged to find a way into an ongoing academic conversation through immersion in an area. As students undertake extensive research, their questions will shift and change. They will need to, as writers so often do, negotiate multiple, conflicting perspectives on a particular issue.

Critical Thinking, Reading, and Writing

Working as researchers, students will read and write extensively as they develop and refine their inquiry projects in Writing and Research Workshop. They encounter a range of texts and learn to read source-based writing and other forms of written inquiry. For example, students may read texts written for a general audience as well as texts written for a highly specialized academic audience. With each reading encounter, they act as active readers willing to understand and interrogate the text at hand.

Students also consider the various rhetorical moves and research strategies that other writers use. They work to consider how others' ideas complicate and deepen their own understandings, often leaving them with a richer set of questions rather than “the” answer.

Knowledge of Process and Conventions-

The process of inquiry is driven by questions, and the product of an investigation is built around a response to others' ideas. In Writing and Research Workshop, students are introduced to the many ways that research is conducted—from gathering data and information within academic resources to initiating first-hand research of various kinds (e.g. interviews, observations, surveys, and so on).

Additionally and importantly, in Writing and Research Workshop students experience various ways of representing research in writing—from using research-based writing to add to or extend an ongoing conversation, to exploring what they think about a question or issue, to making a research-based assertion in some way. Students and instructors are encouraged to work in digital spaces as much as possible, and they are also pushed to consider how research-based genres work in a variety of settings.

A Final Note about the Activity of Writing and Research-

In Writing and Research Workshop students work within a community of writers and researchers in which they understand that membership implies engagement with each others' struggles to make meaning. They experience writing as a social interaction for a particular purpose, for knowledge is not created in isolation but through dialogue and writing which is shared with a real audience. The writing classroom is an intellectual community that encourages students to think deeply, where difference is not only accepted but is also seen as an opportunity for learning—and for further inquiry.

Writing and Research Workshop Student Outcomes

Writing

- Students in writing classes continuously produce written work in short and long writings. This includes evaluated work, such as formal assignments and subsequent revisions, as well as informal and non-evaluated writing, such as research blog entries, annotated bibliographies, collaborative threaded discussions, in-class writing exercises, reflective logs and memos, rough drafts, and peer responses.
- Students can expect to write a considerable amount of informal and non-evaluated work from which their formal, evaluated work will grow.
- Throughout the semester, instructors generally assign three substantial, research-based projects, sometimes building from a particular theme or area of inquiry. Students produce the equivalent of approximately 15+ pages' worth of “final draft” material. As students work in digital spaces, the writing produced should be appropriate for those genres and media.

- Writing and Research Workshop is a revision-based writing course. At the end of the semester, students select at least three “final draft” projects to substantially revise and also write an intelligent summative evaluation of their newly-acquired composition understandings and need areas of future writings . Taken as a whole, the revisions and reflection demonstrate how students have met or exceeded the assessment scoring guide for Writing and Research Workshop. The final portfolio grade will account for a significant portion of students’ grades.

Research

- Instructors assign at least four research-based projects that use multiple and varied sources of information. As many disciplines encourage writers to develop and refine a position, the culminating writing assignment requires students to take a perspective and/or build an argument utilizing deep, clear and logical thinking coupled with sound research utilizing an understanding of structured query-based language, keyword and advanced searching techniques.
- Students will engage in extensive practice with and reflection on text- and/or digitally-based academic research. They will also be encouraged to use multiple forms of research (e.g., observations, interviews, surveys) and to consider how researchers make conscious choices about research tools.

Course Community

- Writing courses are highly interactive and depend on frequent feedback, discussions, and in-class workshops. Attendance, in-class participation, and respect for submission deadlines are expected in writing classes.

Unit 1: The Writing and Research Process and Narrative Writing

Summary: Student writing and research processes are assessed as students read and research the descriptive narrative styles and techniques of a variety of successful authors and examine dialogue, multiple plot lines, precise descriptive language, style, tone, etc. and write a research paper detailing those effective styles and techniques. The pre-assessment is intended to direct not only large-group, but also individual instruction throughout the course. Students will then write a personal narrative where they reveal the details of a particular subject or experience through complete intelligent observation and bring the subject to life in their lively narrative writings.

Students will analyze and synthesize the research and write a research-based literary analysis of their selected text(s) in M.L.A. Style rich with a highly descriptive discussion rich in detail about narrative style and techniques. Students will provide a self analysis of their writing and research processes in the areas of prewriting, drafting, revising, proofreading, publishing, thesis development or writing a claim, organizing or structuring, providing evidence or supporting their claim, logically analyzing the research, and using thoughtful, intelligent language conventions. Students will then select an appropriate topic or purpose and audience and write a draft of a personal narrative by applying their understandings of narrative style, form and techniques and incorporating these elements into their writing. Students will self-evaluate their work, peer edit and then conference their narrative with the instructor. Students will revise their work accordingly and draft a final version for submission.

Writing and Research Workshop

Unit 2: Informative / Explanatory Writing

Grade: 12

Summary: This unit extends students' primary source research process from Unit 1 to include secondary source research in their expository writings. In this unit, students will read and /or examine works of both fiction and nonfiction, research, and write informative and expository texts in M.L.A. Style.

Unit 3: Argumentative Writing

Grade: 12

Summary: This unit fortifies students’ understanding of utilizing both primary and secondary source research from Units 1 and 2 to include secondary source research in their argumentative writings. In this unit, students will read and /or examine works of nonfiction, research, and write argumentative texts in M.L.A. Style. Additionally, students will build an argument utilizing deep, clear and logical thinking coupled with sound research utilizing an understanding of structured query-based language, keyword and advanced searching techniques.

Pacing Guide: 4-6 weeks of study recommended.
